P R E F A C E.

THE composer of the charming Opera of Faust was born at Paris, in 1818, or, according to the less reliable account, in 1815. He first studied harmony under Reicha. At the age of eighteen he entered the counterpoint class of Halévy, in the Conservatoire, and subsequently went through a course of lyric composition under Lesueur. At the age of twenty-one he gained the prize of the Institute, and made a very successful entry upon public notice with a Mass of his composition, which was performed at the church of St. Eustache. He went to Rome, to complete his studies, where he produced, in 1841, a second Mass. This was given at the church of S. Luigi dei Francesi; and, in testimony of its merits, he received the rare distinction of being named honorary maestro di capella for life. Gounod proceeded thence to Vienna, where, in 1842, he produced a Requiem, and, in the year following, another sacred work for performance in Lent. He returned to Paris, and was appointed maitre de chapelle to the church of the Missions Etrangères, and for some years devoted himself to compositions for the concert-room, among which may be noticed a cantata called Pierre L'Hermite, two choral pieces, named La danse de l'épee, and Le vin des Gaulois, and several orchestral symphonies. He became ambitious to write for the stage; and, being introduced to Mad. Viardot, she encouraged him in the idea by promising that if he would compose an opera, in which she might sustain the principal character, she would interest herself to obtain the production of the work. Thus stimulated, he wrote the opera of Sapho, which was performed, through the influence of the prima donna, at the Académie Impériale, in April, 1851, and was given also at her recommendation at the Royal Italian Opera, in the summer of the same year. It met with no success in London; and, even in Paris, though it raised the composer's reputation, it had but a short-lived career. In 1852, Gounod wrote choruses for Ponsard's tragedy of Ulysse, which was performed at the Théâtre Française; and, in 1856, he brought out his second opera La Nonne Sanglante, at the Académie. He was appointed director of the Orphéonists in Paris, in 1852, and exerted his talent for some years in the promotion of the objects of that very important musical organization. He came again before the world as a dramatic composer, in 1859, when his opera of Faust was given at the Théâtre Lyrique, with Mad. Miolan Carvalho as the heroine, and achieved a success that bears no comparison with that of any of his other works—placing him very high in the ranks of living composers. Faust was represented at La Scala, Milan, in the Lent of 1863, and in the ensuing season at the two Italian Opera-houses in London. Each performance added to the reputation of the composer.

The Italian version presented at the two London houses differed in one essential point, viz., the situation of the death of Valentine. At Her Majesty's Theatre, this incident was placed after the scene in the church; at the Royal Italian Opera it occurred before that scene. The latter arrangement is more consistent with the dramatic flow of the story, and is, moreover, the form in which it was originally presented to the public. Siebel's romance, "When all was young," in the fourth act, was composed expressly for Madame Didiée, and first introduced in the Royal Italian Opera version. The charming "Spinning-wheel Song," belonging to the character of Margaret, in the same act, was omitted in both Italian versions. It is included in the following pages. The duet, in the fifth act, "My heart is torn with grief and repentance," was much elaborated by the composer for the Italian Theatre. So, also, was the concluding trio. Indications of the instrumentation have been copiously marked throughout the piano-forte part; also the metronome marks and signs of expression which appear in the original score. No pains have been spared to render the present edition of Gounod's great dramatic work as interesting and useful as possible.

EDWARD F. RIMBAULT.

NOTE TO THE AMERICAN EDITION.

THE words of the present edition are the same that were translated by Mr. Chorley for the English work, with the exception of those fitted to the principal songs, which were translated from the original French text of M. M. Barbier and Carré, by Mr. J. C. Johnson.

The scene on Walpurgis night, which is described in the following narration, is usually omitted in giving the opera; probably because it lengthens, unreasonably, the performance.

ACT I.

FAUST is discovered alone in the deep silence of his study. The lamp, by which he has been poring over the volume spread before him, is about to expire, and throws a feeble and vacillating glimmer upon the open page, and the heap of musty parchment scrolls that encumber the table. Its fast sinking light is an image of the soul of Faust, gradually yielding to the darkness of despair. A life spent in acquiring the subtle but fruitless learning of his age, has brought no gleam of true knowledge, and the unanswered questionings of his restless spirit torture him with the agonies of universal scepticism. He impatiently closes the volume, and as his eyes turn to the distant horizon, where gleams the dawning of another day added to his weary existence, he invokes the only liberator his perplexed and unsatisfied soul can hope for—Death! But too impatient in his wretchedness to await its natural advance, he seizes a phial that stands among the philosophical apparatus on the table, and, having poured its deadly contents into a crystal goblet, he is about to drain them, when, just as he is raising the cup to his lips, the voices of a number of young girls are heard from without saluting the morn in a joyous chorus. The visions of human mirth and careless enjoyment of life, which these sounds evoke, unnerve the soul of Faust in its fell purpose; and the goblet so many times emptied in the joyous feasts of his ancestors, but now mantling with a death-dealing draught, trembles in his hand. He makes, however, another effort to raise the poison-chalice to his lips, when again the busy world without sends its echoes into his lonely study. This time it is a band of field laborers hastening to their work, singing as they go, and praising God for the fruitfulness of the earth. Faust is spirit-stricken by these spontaneous hymns from the simple-hearted children of toil, and checked in his impious purpose, drops the fatal goblet from his hand. But his soul has been too long wasted, by the blasting influence of doubt, for the wholesome impression thus made to be anything but momentary. On the contrary, he despairs of the beneficence and compassion of the Creator—and, cursing all human joys, all human passions, thoughts and impulses, his own existence, the dream of love and ambition, the aspirations of faith and piety, he calls on Satan, the enemy of mankind, to aid him.

The invocation is soon answered, and Mephistopheles, the mocking fiend, appears, attired in the costume of a gallant of that day; a tall feather in his hat, a stout blade on his hip, and a well-filled pouch hanging to his girdle. Faust is at first startled by the sudden apparition, but, recovering himself, is disposed to give his visitor, though invited, but a sullen reception, and, in fact, plainly requests him to withdraw to the place whence he came. The fiend, once admitted to parley, however, is not so easily got rid of. Mephistopheles pretends to be piqued at Faust's apparent want of faith in his power, and challenges the doctor to afford him an opportunity of displaying it. He offers him riches, glory, power—but Faust prefers to these the gift of renewed youth, a treasure which he deems to comprise all others. Youth, therefore, with its enchanting illusions, its wild joys and tumultuous emotions, is what he asks the fiend to endow him with. Mephistopheles informs him that the matter is easy to him, but a trifling condition is exacted, as is usual with the ministers of the powers below, when gratifying mortals with the accomplishment of their wishes. The compact is that the fiend is to serve Faust faithfully during his earthly career; but, that terminated, their positions will be reversed, and the master will then become the slave. Mephistopheles, like a business-like fiend, has the necessary document about him, and hands it to Faust for signature. Seeing, however, that the doctor is hesitating, he determines to use his demoniac power to give him a foretaste of the raptures in store for him when the bargain shall be completed. Suddenly a vision takes form before the eyes of Faust. In a humble dwelling, by the side of a spinning-wheel, at which she is placidly working, is seated a simple village girl. The guileless purity of her heart is as apparent in the calm repose of her demeanor, as are the tender graces of her form arrayed in all the freshness of budding maidenhood. It is Margaret, the innocent victim, who is to die in agony, entangled in the toils of Faust's fiendish adviser, as a dove flutters itself to death in the fowler's net. Faust is enraptured at the beautiful apparition, and hesitates no longer to ratify the compact by his signature. Mephistopheles takes up the self same cup which Faust had in his despair filled with poison, and hands it to him, foaming and sparkling with the elixir that is to renew within him the springs of existence, as it clothes him outwardly in the brilliant and fascinating garb of youth. As Faust empties the life-giving cup, he turns to the vision of Margaret, which slowly fades from sight; but Mephistopheles promises the enraptured Faust, who is now outwardly and inwardly transformed from a decrepid, doubt-distracted doctor of letters and science, to a youthful and ardent lover, that his passionate desire to behold Margaret in actual and bodily presence shall be satisfied that very day.

ACT II.

The scene has changed to the exterior of a tavern, at the sign of the god Bacchus, situated near one of the gates of the town. A motley crowd is assembled, consisting of students, burghesses, soldiers, young maidens, and more mature matrons. The students are singing one of their drinking songs; the soldiers are vaunting their prowess in love and war; the burghesses are tranquilly discussing the news; the maidens are watching the students and soldiers with glances half shy, half provoking; and the matrons are indulging in not over amiable remarks on their younger sisters.

Wagner, a pupil of Dr. Faust, and who seems equally disgusted with learning, and determined to see the world, has enlisted as a soldier; and, in company with Siebel, a suitor to Margaret, is waiting, cup in hand, a comrade who is to accompany him to the wars, and who is no other than Valentine, the brother of Margaret. While Wagner is taunting Siebel with his love-sick melancholy, Valentine joins them; and, he, too, is rallied for his sad looks, inspired also by the gentle Margaret, for whose welfare he expresses a deep, brotherly solicitude; as when he is gone, their mother being dead, she will be left without a protector. Siebel promises to watch over her as a brother; and the party is growing more cheerful again, while Wagner has struck up a popular ditty, when he is coolly interrupted by Mephistopheles, who, having momentarily parted company with Faust, is inclined to afford himself a little amusement at the expense of the guests of the "God Bacchus." Ironically apologising for his intrusion, with some words of affected praise for Wagner's singing, Mephistopheles is challenged to sing himself. He complies with the request, and sings a song satirising the passion for gold, which so pleases the party that they invite him to join them in a beaker of wine. Mephistopheles accepts, and, while the liquor is fetching, amuses himself with predicting the fortunes of the company, by inspecting the palms of their hands. Wagner is told that he will be killed in the first engagement; Siebel is informed that no flower will ever again approach his hand without withering; and Mephistopheles connecting this prediction with an allusion to Margaret, Valentine takes offence at the public mention of his sister's name by a stranger, when Mephistopheles warns him that his fiery temper will get him killed by some one who is not far off; and, pouring out a glass of wine, drinks to the company. No sooner, however, has he tasted the wine, than he pronounces it execrable, and offers to treat the party with more drinkable liquor from his own private cellar. So saying, he jumps on a bench; and is thus brought within reach of the tavern sign over their heads, consisting of a barrel bestridden by the jolly god, whom he apostrophises, at the same time presenting his glass to the tap, from which it is immediately filled with wine. He then proposes to drink a bumper to the health of Margaret; but Valentine, again enraged at the profanation of his sister's name, dashes the goblet from the fiend's hand, and the wine, falling upon the ground, betrays its infernal origin by flashing up in a blaze of fire. Upon this, a wild tumult ensues; Wagner, Valentine, Siebel, and the students, draw their swords, and advance upon Mephistopheles, who, however, safely entrenches himself behind a magical air-drawn barrier, which he traces round him with his sword. In vain do the fiend's assailants endeavor to cross this invincible boundary; they are arrested as by a wall of stone; and Valentine's sword, raised to strike his infernal adversary, is shivered in his hand. With this proof of the demoniacal character of the stranger, they resort to a ready mode of exorcising the fiend, by presenting towards him the hilts of their swords, which representing in form the sacred emblem of man's redemption, Mephistopheles is unable to face, and he is thus compelled to retreat, while Valentine, his friends, and the students retire.

Mephistopheles is now joined by Faust, who, being asked by his diabolical guide and companion how they shall commence their career of earthly pleasures, desires to be brought face to face with the lovely maiden whom he had beheld in the vision evoked by Mephistopheles. The fiend replies that her purity places her under the safeguard of the Celestial Power, against which he cannot contend. Faust then threatens to abandon the fiend if he does not immediately conduct him into her presence; and Mephistopheles replies that, if he will have a moment's patience, the maid, whom he is so eager to behold, will present herself on the very spot where they are then standing.

At the same moment sounds of joy and merriment are heard without, and a band of students and young maidens, among whom is Siebel, appear, walking in couples, arm in arm, preceded by fiddlers, and followed by the burghesses who had previously appeared on the scene. The fiddlers take up their posts on a bench, and the waltzing commences, accompanied by a joyous chorus. Siebel, who expects Margaret shortly to pass that way, refuses to join the dancers, and stands apart, gazing in the direction whence the engrossing object of all his thoughts is to appear. Equally longed for by Siebel and by Faust, though with feelings of far different character, Margaret at length presents herself on her way homeward—modest and simple in garb—modest and simple, but exquisitely graceful in demeanor. Mephistopheles urges Faust to accost her, while he balks Siebel of his intention to do the like by suddenly recognizing him, and persistently placing himself between the lover and the object of his passion. Faust meanwhile boldly addresses Margaret, with a compliment to her beauty, and offers her his arm; but Margaret, with a few artless words and a modest curtsey, rejects both his compliment and his proffered protection, and passes on her way. Faust, who seems to have expected a facile conquest, is disconcerted and dejected at this repulse, but recovers hope when Mephistopheles, as they retire in the direction taken by Margaret, assures him that he shall have the benefit of his assistance in the prosecution of his suit.

ACT III.

We are in the garden attached to Margaret's dwelling, and Siebel is seen to enter by a little door in the wall which separates the garden from the street. He addresses in the rapture of a fond lover the flowers which he sees before him, and bids them plead for him to his mistress. Stooping to gather one, he finds it wither in his grasp, and is reminded of the prediction of Mephistopheles at the tavern. He plucks another, and still with the same result. At last, as he approaches a little pavilion to which Margaret is wont to resort, to perform her devotions, he perceives a small holy-water font, at its entrance, into which he plunges his fingers, in the hope that this will counteract the fiend's malice. On again attempting to gather a bouquet of flowers, he is delighted to find that these intended messengers of his love no longer wither at his touch; and, laughing at his triumph over the witchcraft of Mephistopheles, retires to another part of the garden. Meanwhile, Faust and his faithful attendant steal softly into the garden, and overhear Siebel's expressed determination, as he places the flowers he has gathered where Margaret will discover them, to declare his love at their next interview. Mephistopheles, who knows that Siebel is over-estimating his courage, utters a sarcastic exclamation, and Siebel hastens away. The fiend now proposes to Faust, that, as a counterbalance to the bouquet of his rival, they should present Margaret with a casket of trinkets; but Faust, who is plunged in a reverie under the influence of the passion which he feels is taking a deeper and deeper hold on him, disdains to answer, and Mephistopheles retires, bent on unearthing some buried treasure, in order to procure the means of making an impression on Margaret's mind favorable to his diabolical designs.

Faust, left alone, approaches the pavilion; and, profoundly impressed with the air of peace and innocence which seems to pervade the chamber inhabited by Margaret, apostrophises the dwelling which has witnessed the gradual unfolding of so pure and lovely a being. Mephistopheles soon reappears, however, to mar this wholesome train of thought. He has brought with him a casket, and informs Faust that Margaret is approaching. Faust declares that he will not disturb the calm happiness of which he has just been contemplating the delicate and indefinable traces; but Mephistopheles overcomes his virtuous resolution by referring to the probable success of his rival, Siebel, and threatening to assist him by handing over the casket of jewels to him.

At this moment, Margaret's light footstep is heard; Mephistopheles hastily places the casket in the way of the all-unconscious victim of his arts, and hurries Faust away to another part of the garden. Margaret then appears, and wrapt in thought, slowly advances towards an arbor where her spinning-wheel is placed, and, sitting down beside it, begins to wind the wool round her spindle. Her mind is dwelling on the young stranger who so boldly accosted her, and she acknowledges herself curious to know his name and rank—a high one, as she conceives, for only the high-born wear so resolute and dauntless a mien. While thus yielding to the interest which Faust has already awakened in her breast, she mechanically pursues her work, and accompanies it, according to her daily wont, with some popular ballad; this time it is one which celebrates the constancy of a certain King of Thule, who, having received a drinking-cup from his dying love, goes on drinking to her memory, his eyes filling with tears as he empties the cup, until, feeling the approach of death, he casts the cherished goblet into the ocean, and, having watched it fill and sink, quietly yields up his spirit. At the close of this ditty, Margaret is about to enter the pavilion, when she perceives the flowers left by Siebel, and recognizes them at once as his gift; and the next moment her eye lights on the rich casket left by Mephistopheles. The key is in the lock; and, yielding to a natural curiosity, though not without some misgivings, she opens it, and its dazzling contents are displayed before her wondering eyes. She is tempted to try the effect of one or two of these glittering ornaments upon her person; and, a looking-glass being very opportunely placed within the casket, the force of the artfully contrived bait to the innocent girl's womanly vanity is too powerful for resistance. First, she decks herself only with a pair of ear-rings; and, pleased with their effect, she proceeds to fasten a necklace about her white swan-like throat; and, lastly, clasps a bracelet about her arm; and, scarcely knowing herself as she surveys her image in the glass, she wonders what the stranger would think of her thus splendidly bedecked. In the midst of her childish admiration of herself, she is surprised by the entrance of her neighbor, Martha, a dame of mature years, though not overburdened with discretion, or very strict in her ideas of propriety. Martha is astonished to see Margaret decked out in costly jewelry, and interrogates her as to whence they have come. Margaret, ashamed and confused to be caught wearing finery which she does not at first dream to have been destined for her, at last, on being pressed by the old gossip, Martha, confesses that she was addressed in the morning by a gallant young stranger in the street. Martha jumps at the conclusion that it must be he, and adds that he must be a prince, at least, to make such a magnificent present. Margaret, alarmed at the very thought, is regretfully hastening to divest herself of the jewels, while Martha persuades her to keep them, and defy the gossiping tongues of neighbors, when Mephistopheles suddenly makes his appearance, followed by Faust, and, with a profound bow, apologizes for his intrusion, and asks for Madame Martha Schwerlein.

While Margaret, who has recognized Faust, is hurriedly replacing the jewels with which she had adorned herself, in their casket, Martha announces herself to be the identical personage inquired after. Mephistopheles, after pointing out aside to Faust that his present has been graciously received, and that it is only because Margaret has guessed who was the donor, that she is now suddenly taking them off,—proceeds to inform Martha that he has news for her, sad news, which, however, interest but her alone; and, on this pretext, takes her apart, leaving Faust and Margaret together. The story, which Mephistopheles has trumped up to gain an opportunity for his master to obtain an interview with Margaret, is that Martha's husband, who had deserted her, is dead; that he died at Padua, and that Mephistopheles had brought her his last words. These last words are not, as Mephistopheles recounts them in his sarcastic way, over-consolatory; but he recommends the dame to think no more of him, and after waiting the interval demanded by common decency, to take a successor, with a hint that, were it not his lot to be ever on the wing, he should esteem himself but too fortunate to be permitted to place the wedding-ring upon her finger. While Mephistopheles is thus cajoling dame Martha, Faust does not fail to improve the occasion; and, gradually overcoming the reserve of Margaret by his pressing but tenderly respectful advance, leads her into a conversation, which proceeds simultaneously with that between Mephistopheles and Martha; and the mockery of the fiend, amusing himself with the silly vanity of the old lady, affords a striking and impressive contrast with the beautiful simplicity, modesty, and artless trustfulness with which Margaret, replying to Faust's questions, relates the brief and homely, but touching story of her life, and of her present position. The brother is gone for a soldier; a mother, long since a widow, is but lately dead; and, sadder than all, the little sister whom Margaret had tended with a mother's care, and had learned to love with a mother's love, had been reft from her also by the ruthless hand of death.

Faust, now left alone with Margaret, Mephistopheles having retired, is deeply touched at the affecting disclosure of Margaret's helpless and hapless condition; but his compassion for her only serves to feed his lawless passion, and to increase the ardor with which he seeks to entangle her inexperienced heart. Ere the interview is terminated, Margaret has lost her heart; and in her simplicity and innocence has confessed it, after consulting the oracle of the daisy,—“he loves me, loves me not,”—placing herself completely at the mercy of her lover. Faust now bids her adieu until the morrow, when Mephistopheles, having skillfully got rid of dame Martha, who was growing somewhat too tender, encounters him at the garden door, and, taunting him with abandoning his opportunity, begs him at any rate to stay and listen to what the maiden has to say to the stars. At the same moment Margaret appears at her window, and, believing herself alone, pours forth aloud all the tender emotions with which Faust has inspired her. The lover, in an ecstasy of joy at this unrestrained acknowledgment of his conquest, rushes forward and reveals his presence to Margaret, who, thus treacherously surprised, and having now lost her last defence against the demon-aided seductions of her adorer, lets her head droop upon the shoulder of Faust, and Mephistopheles, sure of the success of his infernal plot, leaves the lovers with a laugh of fiendish mockery.

ACT IV.

Some time has elapsed since Margaret's first interview with Faust. She is now sitting dejected by the side of her spinning-wheel, awaiting, with a mournful, yearning heart, the return of Faust, whose prolonged absence from her she refuses to construe into an abandonment. From beneath her window arise the sounds of girlish voices. They are those of her former companions, jeering at Margaret in her misfortune; and the sting of their taunts is felt the more deeply as the poor victim of an infernal machination remembers with what severity she, too, had visited one of her own sex, who had fallen into shame. One friend, alone, remains to offer sympathy to the desolate girl—Siebel, the rejected lover—who offers to hunt out the seducer, and avenge her wrong; but Margaret's heart still clings with fond affection to Faust, and will not harbor one suspicion against his truth and constancy. In her loneliness and dejection, the conscience-stricken girl turns to the only true source of consolation. Every once friendly house is now closed upon her; but there is one door which she may yet enter, and which is always open to sorrow and repentance. Margaret's dwelling faces the church, and she hastens to lay down the burthen of her heart at the foot of the altar. Already at the threshold of the sanctuary, oppressed with a sense of guilt, she falls on her knees, beseeching the divine mercy. The fiend, however, is watching his victim, and aware how near she now is to perfect freedom from the thralldom of the power he serves. Mephistopheles whispers in her ear as the voice of her own conscience such heavy self-accusation, and pictures the contrast between her former happy innocence and present abject and despised condition, that for a time her faith in the power of repentance is over-clouded, and her soul is possessed only with the terrors of eternal punishment. These fearful impressions are rendered more torturing still by the chant, which is now heard from within the church, celebrating the glories and the terrors of the last day. Margaret struggles, against the demoniac influence, to preserve a ray of hope; but the voices of the evil spirits, commanded by Mephistopheles, so crush her spirit with threats of divine vengeance, that, at last, she sinks unconscious in an agony of terror upon the pavement. The solemn peals of the organ continue after the sacred chant has ceased; and as they slowly die away, Margaret revives, and free for a moment, from her demoniac tormentors, rushes into the church.

Margaret has need of the spiritual strength which she is imploring to bear up against the fresh sorrows that await her. Valentine, her brother, has returned from the wars, though without his companion, Wagner, who, in fulfilment of the fiend's prediction, has perished in his first action. The soldier is welcomed by his friend Siebel, whose confusion at the anticipated disclosure of Margaret's fault arouses Valentine's suspicion, and he hastily inquires for his sister. Siebel implores her brother to be merciful to her; and Valentine, shocked at so ominous a speech, but refusing to believe his sister guilty, rushes into their house, while Siebel turns towards the church, to prevent the meeting of Margaret with her brother. At this critical moment, Faust and Mephistopheles appear, the latter carrying a guitar beneath his mantle. After a short parley with Faust, who, under the influence of a gloomy presentiment, hesitates to enter Margaret's dwelling, lest he should draw down some calamity upon her, Mephistopheles proposes that he shall announce Faust's return by a serenade, to the accompaniment of his guitar. The song he forthwith trolls forth is, from beginning to end, a gross and taunting insult to Margaret in her wretched plight. Faust vainly endeavors to check him, when Valentine rushes from the house, furious, and, drawing his sword, strikes at Mephistopheles' guitar, and shivers it to pieces. A combat ensues between Faust and Valentine, who, previous to the encounter, has disdainfully thrown away a medallion which his sister had given him, and to which he had attributed his safety amidst the perils of war. Mephistopheles sees the action, and, rejoicing at the rejection of a talisman which would have baffled him, prepares to stand by Faust during the duel, telling him to think only of lunging, as he would do the parrying. Valentine's skill and determined courage are unavailing against such a combination, and in a few passes he falls wounded to death. Mephistopheles hurries Faust away, and the neighbors, roused at the brawl, rush in to find Valentine alone, his life fast ebbing. Margaret makes her way through the crowd, and throws herself on her knees by the side of her brother, who, with the last remnant of strength, repels her; and then, while he is supported by the bystanders, pours forth with his dying breath a torrent of imprecations on the head of Margaret, predicting a career of shame and misery for her, and upbraiding her for still preserving the chain of gold about her neck, (which Margaret immediately tears off and throws away,) pronounces her accursed here below, and dies amidst the horror of the crowd, and the utter consternation and despair of Margaret, whom Siebel draws away from the dreadful scene.

ACT V.

The Walpurgis night, or witches' Sabbath, to which Mephistopheles conducts Faust, with a view to sink him more deeply in the sensuous delights of a mere voluptuary, and to drown the last murmurs of conscience with a revival of the orgies which marked the most dissolute period of antiquity, fails of the desired effect. In the midst of the revelry to which he has yielded himself, and while, goblet in hand, Faust is singing an anacreontic effusion, a voice reaches his ear, the well-known accents of which, though enfeebled by distance, causes a thrill to pervade his whole frame; the goblet is arrested on its way to his lips, and the name of Margaret escapes his trembling lips. At the same moment, a pale phantom, in whose livid features he recognizes those of the wretched Margaret, appears awhile, and then suddenly vanishes. Faust, a prey to the wildest horror and remorse, insists on being conducted to Margaret by Mephistopheles, whom he forcibly drags along with him, while he pierces his way, sword in hand, through the host of demons and infernal monsters that beset him, and seek to frustrate his purpose.

With this prelude we are introduced to the last scene of the tragic drama — a prison. Margaret, driven to frenzy by the excess of her sufferings, culminating in the murder of her brother by the man to whom she had sacrificed all, and by whom she has been to all appearance basely deserted, has destroyed her offspring, and awaits in a dungeon the doom of human justice. Mephistopheles has contrived to steal the prison keys from the sleeping jailor, and Faust enters the cell where his victim lies sleeping, during a brief respite from the restless activity of her distracted and phantom-haunted brain. Faust calls on her, and she awakens, appearing to recognize his voice, and to hail him as her deliverer, whom she is ready to clasp once more to her bosom with all the trusting love of former days. But as Faust presses her to fly with him at once, as the time is pressing, he perceives that his words are unheeded, and that he is speaking to one whose distracted mind is entirely absorbed with the phantoms that haunt its ruins. Mephistopheles now appears, and urges them to haste, as the day is dawning, and it will soon be too late to effect the escape of the prisoner. Margaret's excitement increases at the aspect of the hated fiend, to whom she has ever attributed all her misfortunes, and, kneeling in an ecstasy of pious abandonment, calls upon heaven and its pure angels to protect, forgive, and receive her. A noise is heard as of some one approaching: Faust again presses her to escape; but a gleam of memory flashes upon her as she gazes in his face and recognizes the murderer of her brother. Shrinking wildly from his blood-stained touch, she sinks upon the ground, and yields her spirit—not to the infernal powers, as Mephistopheles implies by his exclamation "Accursed!" but to the heavenly protection which, even in her madness, she had implored, as is announced by the celestial voices which proclaim her "Saved!"

METHODS OF INSTRUCTION FOR THE VOICE.

Valuable Books for Schools and Classes,

Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., 277 Washington Street, Boston.

BASSINI'S ART OF SINGING. An Analytical, Physiological, and Practical System for the Cultivation of the Voice. By Carlo Bassini. Edited by R. Storrs Willis. Complete, $1.00; abridged, $2.50; for Tenor Voice, $4.00.

This work is one of the greatest excellence as a System of Thorough Instruction in Vocalization. It is constructed on a rigidly scientific basis, considering the mechanism of the vocal organs, different qualities of voice, just methods of articulation, true process of culture, &c., with a series of exercises from the simplest method of uniting the chest and medium registers to the most difficult trills, and is, unquestionably, the most desirable system extant for both teachers and pupils. An eminent professor of music pronounces it superior to all others, and adds, "In the first nineteen pages is embodied more sound sense on the nature and capabilities of the human voice, than can be found in half a dozen similar works by European masters."

BALEF'S NEW SINGING METHOD, without the Use of Solfeggio, designed for persons who cannot have the assistance of a Master. $2.00.

BAKER & SOUTHARD'S VOCAL METHOD. Illustrated by Comprehensive Examples and Solfeggios from the works of Panseron, Paer, Garandé, Bagioli, Winter, and others. By B. F. Baker and L. H. Southard. $3.50.

BORDOGNI'S ART OF PHRASING. Book I., $1.00; Book II., $1.25.

BORDOGNI'S 36 VOCALIZES. For Soprano or Tenor Voices. In 3 Books, each $2.50.

The author endeavors to present, in the clearest manner, all the ornaments and styles of song, the most useful to render intonation perfect, easy, and flexible; to give a knowledge of accent, and at the same time to instruct the pupil in respiration, — the most difficult acquirement in the art of singing, and one on which the perfection of song depends.

BORDOGNI'S 12 NEW VOCALIZES. For Mezzo-Soprano. In two Nos., each $1.25.

CAMPANA'S EASY SOLFEGGI, for Mezzo-Soprano or Contralto, in the style of the best Italian school. $1.00.

CONCONE'S FIFTEEN VOCALIZES. In two Nos., each $1.25.

CONCONE'S FORTY NEW LESSONS. For Bass or Baritone. In Two Books, each $2.50.

The studies of the First Book begin simply with sounding a note, that the singer may give entire attention to producing every sound with perfect accuracy of intonation, equality of force, and purity and fulness of tone. Those of the Second Book are confined within the compass of a bass voice.

CONCONE'S 25 LESSONS. Op. 10. Two Books, each $1.25.

CRESCENTINA'S ART OF SINGING; or, 25 New Vocalizes. Arranged with Harp or Piano Accompaniments. By A. Panseron. $3.50.

This is a new edition of one of the best vocal methods published, and has been greatly improved by the addition of New Exercises for Sustaining the Voice, and an Engraving representing all the parts of the Mouth and Throat brought into action in its cultivation.

LABLACHE'S 12 VOCALIZES. For Soprano and Tenor. $1.00.
